By separating your expenses into categories, it is easier to judge how close one is to going over their designated limit. Example categories consist of groceries, rent, and extracurriculars.       |

| 1. Option 1 is a simple code, easy to write and will not take very much time to write. This code tracks expenses very simply and efficiently. However, without a budget, the expense records are not very helpful for managing money. So, it does not fully meet the business need. 2. Option 2 is similar to option 1. It will take significantly more time to finish than Option 1. It also tracks expenses very simply and efficiently. However, with a budget, each expense can be categorized and update the remaining budget funds. This option would adequately solve the business need, but it would take the most time and resources to complete. 3. Option 3 is the cheapest. It requires no time and has no cost. However, this does not address the business need at all. |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |

| Our group recommends option 2 as the intended design. We feel the time and resources needed to complete this option are justified, as it successfully meets the business need.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
